As shifting economies and the successes of the feminist movement have resulted in women comprising the majority of paid workers (albeit a slight majority) in the U.S. for the first time,¹ - Jean-Jacques Rousseau's long honored notion of the "Good Mother" and the demand that she blithely sacrifice all for the good of her children and family has been dutifully challenged. But as women have claimed presence within the domestic AND public realms, conservative groups have predictably lamented the decline of "family values." Within that cry, the child has often been portrayed as endangered and lost while mothers seeking to redefine their roles and obligations are regularly characterized as frantic and on the verge of unraveling as though to prove that women really can't do it all. In contradiction, celebrity moms appear to have it all; a fulfilling career, beautiful biological and adopted children, plenty of bling, and an active social life - but only because they engage in that most despicable practice of hiring a nanny. Meanwhile, the everyday mom is perpetually undone by her duties, rarely with any realism that speaks adequately to the real-life complexities she faces. While far from being resolved, such contretemps are symptomatic of a cultural anxiety over the changing states of family and a realization that idealistic, largely unattainable notions of family-hood are historically and culturally unusual, and thus should continue to be frankly reconsidered in the twenty-first century.

Drawing from the curators' own efforts to balance the demands of motherhood with creative and professional endeavors, Denise Johnson and Rebecca Trawick consider how contemporary artists have explored modern parenthood under the pressures of changing economies and evolving definitions of family, parenthood, and gender roles. Separation Anxiety is inspired and bolstered by the explorations of others in contemporary art, film, television, memoir and creative writing, documentaries and academic research. Most recently, exhibitions such as Jennifer Wroblewski's 2009 exhibition *Mother/mother (A.I.R. Gallery, New York, New York); Olja Stipanović's current exhibition, Curators (raising humans) (BUZZER30, Long Island City, New York); and the ongoing work artists' Rebecca Niederlander and Iris Anna Regn are exploring with BROODWORK: Creative Practice and Family Life (Los Angeles, California) have proven important expressions of similar themes.

Of particular interest in Separation Anxiety are the ordinary losses that parents must reconcile as their broods enter the world, and as those children build a sense of self, the challenges they must navigate - whether raised in a "traditional" household or in less acknowledged "alternative" family structures. The artists in this exhibition boldly tread through difficult terrain as they examine such topics as their own marginalized family units and a veiled sense of dread surrounding the parent/child relationship. The works in this exhibition provide a much needed opportunity to step back and reevaluate popular culture frenzies like the Jon and Kate divorce, the 90's murder of child-pageant queen JonBenet Ramsey, and Angelina Jolie's seemingly insatiable desire to adopt as they are painted in the context of laws that function to reinforce long-standing yet problematic expectations of family, parenthood and childhood.

This examination of family and of parenthood is not essentialist. Separation Anxiety does not propose one solution, ideal or universally applicable model. Instead, the exhibition embraces diversity and curiously ponders interwoven identities, contradictory states and the irony that family could ever be perfect - without fault, Utopian, pristine, or superlative. Indeed, within the context of this exhibition, to consider those descriptives in relation to family appears at once absurd. As Greek myth so astutely (and so often) pointed out, the very nature of family life is rife with tension, disagreement and contested states. The wonder involved in an exploration of those difficulties and tensions betrays the importance of those relationships to the human condition.

Claudia Alvarez creates ceramic sculptures and works on paper featuring not-so-cuddly, hard-edged and opportunistic children absorbed in melee and destruction. For example, in The Playground (2010), a group of children surround a figure who is kicking a small boy as he attempts to get up off the ground. The surprisingly female aggressor seems caught up in a reverie, spurred by the frenzied chanting of her cohorts to enforce her dominance upon her unsuspecting prey. Common in Alvarez's work are children who freely break stereotypes of gender and playground politics allowing the artist to play with the edges of our perceptions about youth, innocence and the frailty of our children. Her work reveals the raw territory of misguided protections and wonton fears promoted by the makers of baby goods and American Pie family lore. Alvarez's children are only victims to themselves, reminiscent of William Golding's lost youth just on the brink of discovery in Lord of the Flies,² they navigate this cruel but tantalizing world with cunning and quick hands.

Monica Bock uses the body as source and as medium, elevating her objects to the sacred realm while encapsulating the visceral in mundane materials. In Postpartum Miniature (1999) she captures maternal life using the physical remnants of childbirth, the placenta from her son's birth, framing the photographic record like a prized family heirloom. The precious matter is at once ludicrous and tantalizing. The viewer is tempted towards repulsion by the artist's insistence on its presence and is prompted to ask, why is it that the "after birth" is such an enigma even to women who've given birth? In Cheek by Jowl (2008), Bock again uses the body as impetus creating a dozen dental casts laying bear the loss of teeth, testimony of the child's entry into the symbolic order. The artist/mother chronicles time through the growth of her child's mouth, those teeth that bite and that mug that grins in agony, anger and ecstasy. Viewers are invited to objectively analyze the mother's tokens, her souvenirs that can't prevent the child from growing up and therefore away from her, but that she hopes can preserve some small facet of remembrance.

Erika de Vries's primary focus on photography is supported by handmade work from her installation, Your Mother Is In the Basement (2009). Conceiving the project while converting her New York home's basement into a studio, and shifting the literal debris of family life to take command of that space, deVries often heard her children upstairs asking "Where is mommy?" The question invariably resulted in considerable thought and research into the domain of the basement and its relation to the lives of the mothers who clean, pack, store and create in that space. The artist states, "As I age, my art work reflects the new place I inhabit, beginning with girlhood, womanhood, and now motherhood."³ Her work at once reflects this investigation as well as a tension between absence and presence using the basement as a metaphor for body, domesticity and memory.

Boundary Lines (2010), the performative reading that Leslie Dick brings to Separation Anxiety is a delayed collaboration with her teen daughter, on the verge of womanhood as she enters college on the coast opposite her home. While the daughter dabbles between the realms of the child and the adult, the mother too must confront physical distance while also grappling with the flux of her own subjectivity. Dick astutely analyzes the repeated, almost systematic physical and psychological separations between mother and child in the short story included in the exhibition, On Splitting: A Symptomatology or, The Los Angeles Maternal Position.⁴ In the work, the 1994 Northridge, CA earthquake serves as a symbol of the impending splits, fissures, shaking and harm that lurks under the surface of the parent/ child bond. The mother is taken aback by the uppity alarm of suburban mothers yet consumed by the "excruciatingly painful" realization that "Parents damage their children, it's unavoidable." The mother must choose to remain trapped by the understanding or manage reconciliation in order to secure firm ground. Both the written work and performance are in dialogue with Dick's installation of documentary photographs (unusual material for the artist) also included in Separation Anxiety. After having created an exquisite scrapbook-like record of each of her child's toys - complete with objective photographs, identifying labels, historical details and familial narratives - Dick realized that the requisite document was far too cherished to allow less invested viewers to physically browse. For Separation Anxiety, she has documented the document, allowing viewers to analyze the parent's tender memento from a safe distance.

Elizabeth Douglas uses photography to respond to her isolation as a mother of three young sons in rural Tennessee. She consciously picks up her camera at the times when she imagines most parents would be imposing and most overbearing. Douglas employs the quaint solitude of vernacular images to memorialize the small triumphs of childhood like exploring the back yard alone for the first time, discovering the many sounds of a pot drum and the sincere belief that with just a little more effort levitation is within reach. In these pathos laden observations, the artist allows her children an autonomy and freedom that twenty-first century parents have been well groomed to apprehend. The premeditated selection is empowering to both parent and child and provides the viewer with an opportunity to see children in an alternative way, decisively outside of today's norm.

Artist Rebecca Edwards creates a sardonic fairy tale fantasy with fleshy, candy-colored works on paper and sculptures. The artist explores the absurd and the political - femininity and feminism, womanhood and family, the realities of raising children and the exalted demands shouldered by caregivers. In Quit It (2007), an illogically tall high chair represents the parent overcome by a tangled mass of children clamoring for attention and sustenance. "She had so many children, she didn't know what to do!" But the motherly stand-in remains catatonic and the wee ones take advantage and cavort. Her only respite, as the title suggests, is a futile negation because the motherly wooden strut / fragile legged beast of burden remains beholden to the whirlwind of need and desire she has produced. Equally, the chair stands for the lofty goals society and families invariably set for children. It is always imagined that this child will be a doctor, a lawyer or a professional athlete and we are forbidden to suppose that they'll become a criminal or derelict.

Carol Flax works in mixed media and various technologies to create video-based works that investigate our relationship to history and memory. Historically, she's often approached issues surrounding parenthood, genealogy, family dynamics, and adoption. In Letting Go (2010), Flax explores her changing positions as parent to grandparent, of a woman moving into a new stage in her life, of the dualities and uncertainties in her life. Deeply personal, she mines the depths of aging, of parenthood, loss and anxiety as she transitions to new chapters in her personal life. In a period when more and more grandparents are taking on primary caregiving responsibilities to their children's children, Flax's installation questions the boundaries of parental influence and when/where the role of mother ceases and the grandmother begins. As well, the work reflects on the communal nature of child rearing to contest quaint notions of the nuclear family while laying bare the animal nature of relationships and care giving.

Haley Hasler uses self-portrait to explore stereotype, symbolism and iconography. Her paintings represent her own likeness while displaying the implausible image of the artist as the woman who can do it all! Hasler takes a critical stance to the domestic goddess myths of our age, slicing through them with a wry sense of humor and an honest consideration of the juggling acts so many women are confronted with on a daily basis. Between endless feedings, diapering, naps, soccer practice, homework and the drama of existence, it's a wonder that any woman survives the demands of parenthood. Hasler slyly sanctifies herself, paying her labor due diligence in representational form. And with an ironic twist, the artist paints large oil paintings, exquisitely rendered as if to give a nod to the desperate beauty there is in the domestic mundane.

In the installation, In Memory of HER Future: Eight Days a Week (2010), Connie Hatch investigates familial power dynamics and the control exerted upon the family unit from the outside by using subtly manipulated found and household clocks to provoke jarring realizations. While the mother's paraphernalia is oft sentimentalized, Hatch ponders the all-seeing eyes of the institution uncovering the machinations that impel the mother to hold near, remember and save. In contrast to Edwards's stoic mother high chair, Hatch's authoritarian lurks within the faces of numerous timepieces that collectively form an imposing but cliché symbol of happiness. Small chairs humble at the mass of time and the pressures of future looming largely over them. The viewer imagines children seeking anchor in the parental clock face/s but time doggedly ticks away, circumstances intervene and life constantly threatens to rip away stability and order. Or, is it that time serves to threaten parents? "Quality time" - making time together meaningful - is evasive and the obstinate ticking makes each moment (together and apart) all the more heavy. Likewise, the face/ the mother's labor is one that never goes away and never ceases to observe - eight days a week - like Sisyphus who was doomed to toil eternally pushing a boulder up hill only to watch it descend once he reaches the mountain's summit. But as Albert Camus explained in The Myth of Sisyphus (1942)⁵ "one must imagine Sisyphus happy," for the experience of the absurdity, the ability to experience, offers great joy however wearisome the travail.

Giant Cleopatra is part two of the trilogy, The Elizabeth Taylor Project (2009) in which Ellina Kevorkian appropriates scenes and dialogue from the Hollywood siren's films, then rearranges and re-contextualizes that matter in an attempt to shift the viewer's gaze from the male's perspective to the female's. In the film, Elizabeth Taylor plays a worried mother who walks - and walks, and walks. The montage is reminiscent of the incessant walking of another infamous mother amongst cinefiles, Chantal Akerman's Jeanne Dielman from Jeanne Dielman, 23 quai du Commerce, 10180 Bruxelles (1975) who's anxious and yet benign steps eventually lead to halting conclusion. The insatiable wander and consternation of Kevorkian's heroine speaks to the seemingly unprovoked apprehension that mothers are so easily and commonly coaxed into. Society constantly warns the mother that there is much to fear and, much to protect that fragile child from. Kevorkian's mother is aware that she has little control, if any (Cleopatra, remember, committed suicide once she realized that she would lose her empire to Rome) and yet must assert a giant, perfect persona to maintain her dignity and some small fraction of order. To the absent child, this woman must be monstrous in her will and capacity! Within the world of fear, misinformation and submission that the mother navigates, Kevorkian's heroine understands all too well the demand that she remain a pleasant thing to be looked at (Cleopatra sits at her dressing table and primps while her empire burns) while she sacrifices all for the daunting needs of that being who lingers just beyond the frame. And so she walks and she worries ...

A self-proclaimed former-workaholic, artist Kate Kretz explores the vulnerability of parenthood in her work, Your Fragility... (2010). Created within six months of her daughter's birth, the embroidered work uses her own hair, lost during her daughter's in utero development. Hair replaces embroidery floss to create the phrase "Your fragility in this sharp world is paralyzing." Profound as it relates to a new parent's unquenchable desire to keep one's children safe and one's mental capacity to imagine the most devastating experiences out in the world. Kretz writes, "Upon the occasion of my daughter's birth, I became almost agoraphobic, irrationally figuring that, if we never left the house, nothing bad could ever happen to her."⁶ In Your Fragility... Kretz lays bare her vulnerability while also creating a mantra, a meditation, a prayer to use as protection. The delicate nature of the parent/ child bond and their mutual frailty lingers on the edge of fetish in the dainty, hand lovingly made, carefully embellished garment that would softly embrace the child's oh-so-susceptible being.

The Los Angeles based collective M.A.M.A. was born in 1998 of a group of artists working to support each other as art makers and parents, and to support the creation of work exploring the realities of motherhood no matter how taboo. In California Civil Code 43.3 (1998), M.A.M.A. looks at the highly controversial right of mothers to breastfeed their children in public spaces.

Referring to the 1997 law protecting the woman's right to feed their children, the work features a number of women breastfeeding their infants from the mother's points of view. Originally on view in Pasadena on a public bench at One Colorado as part of a New Town Pasadena exhibition, the artwork was confiscated by the Pasadena Police overnight because it was initially deemed "obscene." Painfully ironic, the very group who was supposed to uphold the law wasn't able to immediately establish whether the images in the work were illegal. Clearly, despite civic protection, public distaste, fascination and misunderstanding persistently debase this basic right and need.

As an adopted child who's name was changed with each guardianship arrangement, Marcos Rosales's work investigates identities in flux and malleable to the imposing pressures of family frameworks gone awry. In his work, A Transformation (1992) the artist systematically arranged all the names he was given and their various configurations in a humble effort to make solid a sense of self in the absence of figures who are expected to provide the roots of identification. By extension, the artist's dark humor poignantly reflects the pains of abandonment that subtly manifest within the institution's detached scientific observation in the series, Eau de Toilette (1995). The mono prints - singular impressions that are without duplicate - operate as metaphor for the child without known source or linkable history. Rosales's imagined dormitory of boys respond to their conflicted states with extraordinary gestures while the State hones in, distantly observes, and produces recommendations. The children are always kept just beyond knowing - their aggressive sexuality to be controlled, their dangerous instincts to be tamed and their wanderings to be righted. The Rorschach-like combinations of Rosales's own childhood photographs, made to look monstrous through the manipulation, that are paired with the fictive texts play with the aesthetic of objective analysis and further explore the irony imbedded in a search for self without access to family and official records like the genealogical tree.

Mark Stockton's work has long focused on the collisions of identity and celebrity, calling attention to our own grotesque fascination with popular figures. In Separation Anxiety, Stockton examines the popularly known characters JonBenet Ramsey, the six-year-old who was murdered in 1996, and the differently outrageous "Octomom," Nadya Suleman who gave birth to octuplets in 2009 as a single mother of six other children. Ramsey's murder remains unsolved - the perpetual symbol of childhood vulnerability - but has remained an ever present interest to media for more than 14 years. Her parents underwent intense scrutiny and remained top suspects of the unthinkable crime for some time. Adding to the indulgence, JonBenet like her mother before her was a beauty pageant queen, soliciting prize money and attention with coy grins, cheeky dances and terrifically ambivalent sexuality. The abundance of images of JonBenet prancing that emerged upon her death served to further inflame the public's mostly negative, and at times outright hostile, impressions of her parents. Suleman wasn't lauded for her octuplet's healthy birth (only the second full set of octuplets to be born alive in the United States and, one week after their birth, surpassing the previous worldwide survival rate for a complete set of octuplets) or her use of in-vitro fertilization, but was highly criticized due to the fact that she was a single, unemployed mother who already had multiple children at home. Octomom presented the perfect target for conservative fear mongers and "welfare mother" naysayers. In sharp contrast, consider the many reality television shows that celebrate multiple births with patronizing glimpses into the hard work and sleepless nights. Through incredible renderings of these "celebrities," Stockton considers the "good mother," reproductive rights, the exploitation of children, and the artificial manipulation of one's own body in search of celebrity status.

Abbey Williams's dual channel DV and HDV Don't Let Me Down (2009), shown in this exhibition single channel, begins with an earth mother ritual celebration of pregnancy and the life giving force of the mother's body. As the viewer is lulled into comforting rhythms, women dance in a circle while holding hands and singing exaltations of their cosmic ability to reproduce. The artist appears in a snow-covered landscape, Sasquatch-like as she trudges through the inhospitable forest with nothing more than a pair of Uggs. And then suddenly stark images of birth, blood, viscera, pain and pleasure flood the filmic plane catching the viewer off guard and smacking them in the face with a bit of “reality.” The experience is tempered by the knowledge that the artist lost the child she was carrying in the film shortly after its birth. The courage to persevere and endure amidst the most trying of circumstances is ever present in the work and indeed speaks to many women’s experiences within the contemporary art world and the confines of motherhood. Artists who are mothers are commonly discouraged from making work about parenthood. The subject remains a discreetly taboo subject, even in the twenty-first century. Williams takes this faux pas head on in still at land (2009) where she documents her attempts to literally fit into the western art canon. We see the artist moving in futility to match herself with projected images from Maya Deren’s Meshes in the Afternoon (1943). No matter how the artist/mother twists and contorts her form, she remains marginalized and outside, a poignant reminder of the obstacles of inequality that women continue to face.

Mark making is paramount to Jennifer Wroblewski’s artistic practice. In her New Collaboration (2008) series of works on paper, Wroblewski explores a generative kind of mark making by using her body and her then-still-in-utero son as the impetus for the drawings. In the studio, the artist mapped her child’s movements and created a two-dimensional atlas of the sensations she felt from the inside with rhythmic, lyrical marks. Highly intimate, these records recast not only her focus, but her method as an art/ mark maker. Known for her monumental, larger-than-life drawings, Wroblewski contends with the bijou nature of the pregnant mother and unborn child’s bond by paring down her ritualistic gestures and mirroring the proportions of the “baby bump” as it demands ever more space, ever more presence in the mother’s life. The artist considers these works to be “true maps of [my son’s in utero] activity in increments of time.”⁷

The artists in Separation Anxiety critique the evolving landscape of motherhood, parenthood and the lives of families and children in sophisticated, unexpected, thoughtful and often highly personal ways. As honored curators of this exceptional assembly of works, we strive to open meaningful dialogue on the changing principles of family, complexities of contemporary gender roles, the sacrifices involved in artistic practices coinciding with family, and each viewer’s personal experiences of family, childhood, and parenthood. Our sincerest gratitude to each of them for sharing their work with us.

DeVries teaches at New York University, New York, New York. She's also taught at the Brooklyn Museum of Art, Brooklyn, New York, Pratt Institute, New York, New York, and Middlebury College, Middlebury, Vermont.

Leslie Dick was born in Boston, Massachusetts. As a child she moved to London, England where she stayed through college (except during her junior year abroad where she attended UC Berkeley.) Since 1988, Dick has resided in Los Angeles, California, despite the fact that until 2005 she'd always intended to return to England. While still in England, Dick earned her BA at Sussex University in 1977. Her first novel, Without Falling, was published in 1988 and her second, Kicking, in 1992. A collection of short fiction, The Skull of Charlotte Corday and Other Stories followed in 1995. She was a visiting lecturer in Women's Studies at Vassar College and a Mellon Fellow in Arts Criticism at CalArts. She's written about art and culture for various magazines, journals and publications in the US and UK. She's participated in exhibitions throughout the United States and Europe as a performance and visual artist. Selected exhibitions and performances include Whitney Biennial 2010, The Whitney Museum of American Art, New York, New York (2010) where she participated in Martin Kersels Five Songs; Acme Gallery, Los Angeles, California (2008, 2005) with Martin Kersels and Mark Wheaton; Outpost for the Arts, Los Angeles, California (2008); Galerie Vallois, Paris, France (2005). She's also done extensive voice over work for Victor Burgin's video work (2005-2008). Since 1992, Dick has been a member of regular faculty in the Art Program at California Institute of the Arts.

Elizabeth Douglas was born in 1982 in Indiana and has been working in photography since the birth of her first son in 2003. Her work traces the experiences of raising three young boys in the south and serves as a separation between her role as mother and artist. She has exhibited in New York City at AIR Gallery. She lives and works near Memphis, Tennessee.

Rebecca Edwards was born in Lansing, Michigan and lives and works in Pasadena, California. She received her BFA from the San Francisco Art Institute in 1983 and her MFA from California State University, Los Angeles, California in 1992. Solo exhibitions include Pierce College, Los Angeles, California (2008); Moorpark College, Moorpark, California (2004); Don O'Melveny Gallery, West Hollywood (2004); Sonora Studio, Santa Monica, California (2000); Bran Gallery, Glendale, California (1995); The Farm Gallery, San Francisco, California (1986, 1985, 1984). Selected group exhibitions include Sumsumere: Assemblage, Grand Central Art Center, Santa Ana, California (2008), in addition to group exhibitions at College of the Canyons, Santa Clarita (2010); Taft College Gallery, Taft, California (2007); Phantom Gallery, Pasadena, California (2006); Luckman Center, Los Angeles, California (1996); Barnsdall, Los Angeles, California (1995); LACE, Los Angeles, California (1991).

Carol Flax was born in Los Angeles, California and currently lives and works in Clinton, Washington. She received her BA in Art from California State University, Northridge (Summa Cum Laude) in 1980 and her MFA from California Institute of the Arts, Valencia, California in 1982. Solo or two-person collaborative exhibitions include Volitant Gallery, Austin, Texas (2007); Tucson Museum of Art, Tucson, Arizona (2002); Arizona State University, Tempe, Arizona (2000); McKinney Avenue Contemporary, Dallas, Texas (1998); California Museum of Photography, Riverside (1997, group 1994); Inverness Rail Station, Inverness, Scotland (1993), among others. Selected group exhibitions include It's Black, It's White, Joanna Render Gallery, Berlin (2009); in addition to group shows at Net Vision, Austria (2004); University of Arizona Museum of Art, Tucson, Arizona (2003);); Herter Art Gallery, Amherst, Massachusetts (2003); Museo Nacional de Bellas Artes, Buenos Aires (2002); Hellenic World Foundation, Athens, Greece (2001); Cooper Union, New York (1997); LACMA, Los Angeles (1995); Hammer Museum, Los Angeles (1995, 1984); Barnsdall, Los Angeles (1994).

Painter Haley Hasler was born in Fort Collins, Colorado. Hasler currently lives and works in Fort Collins, Colorado. Hasler received her BFA in Indiana University in 1995 and her MFA from the College of Fine Arts, Boston in 1999. One- and two-person exhibitions include Fort Collins Museum of Contemporary Art, Fort Collins, Colorado (2009); Alpha Gallery, Boston, Massachusetts (2006, 2004); Gallery 1234, Trinidad, West Indies (2000). Group exhibitions include Brattleboro Museum and Art Center, Brattleboro, Vermont (2008); Fraser Gallery, Bethesda, Maryland (2007, 2006); The Andrew Gallery, The College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Virginia (2003); and Piedmont Community College Gallery, Charlottesville, Virginia (2003); Danforth Museum of Art, Framingham, Massachusetts (2000); Glass Mountain Gallery, Bantam, Connecticut (1999); and Waldron Arts Center, Bloomington, Indiana (1995). In 1999, Hasler was the recipient of the US Fulbright Program where completed her fellowship at Creative Arts Center, University of the West Indies. Hasler has served as visiting artist at the School of Fine Arts, University of New Hampshire, Durham, Hampshire (2009); the School of Visual Arts, Colorado State University, Fort Collins, Colorado (2009); the College of Fine Arts, Boston University, Boston, Massachusetts (2005-2007); and she's taught at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Virginia and Piedmont Virginia Community College, Charlottesville, Virginia.

Connie Hatch is an artist whose work includes photography, audio, installation and narrative performance. She has exhibited at New Langton Arts, Capp Street, Camerawork and the Museum of Modern Art in San Francisco. Her work has been featured at The New Museum in New York, the Whitney Museum of American Art and the Los Angeles County Museum of Art. She has mounted solo exhibits at Los Angeles Contemporary Exhibitions, the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, Mills College in Oakland and the Rhode Island School of Design. A recipient of The Engelhard Award, she has also received two NEA Visual Artists' Fellowships, one in photography and one in new genre. She has taught at the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, UC San Diego, The San Francisco Art Institute, California College of Arts and Crafts, and UCLA.

Acknowledgements

The curators would like to thank all the individuals who supported this exhibition. To collectors Kathy and Steve Price who so generously loaned artwork to this exhibition. At Chaffey College, we thank Peggy Cartwright, Director of Marketing, and Fred Larimore, Lithography Supervisor; Mark Logan, Purchasing Director; and acknowledge Professional Development, the Faculty Success Center and the School of Visual, Performing and Communication Arts for their generous assistance. In addition, we'd like to recognize the President's Office as well as the many faculty and staff who support Wignall Museum programming through regular monthly donations. Without the support and hard work of Roman Stollenwerk, Assistant Curator, and the Wignall Museum crew, Separation Anxiety could not have been realized. Colleagues Angela Bartlett, Michelle Dowd and Vera Dunwoody have all provided critical input and support, and Designer Diana Giordano of Little Bear Productions created an incredible print identity for Separation Anxiety. In addition, the technical support of Andrew Groves and the assistance of Shelley Marcus and the Chaffey College Library was crucial to the success of the exhibition and programming. Partnerships with Ethics Across the Curriculum, ARTicles and the School of Language Arts provided important curricular ties that allow for further discourse concerning the themes presented in Separation Anxiety. To our most staunch supporters, our families, we thank you...without them this exhibition would not have been borne. Lastly, we would like to thank the artists, whose dedication, enthusiasm and advice truly made this process a labor of love. After years of dialogue, research and hard work, we're delighted to share this exhibition with you.
